Introduction to Clauses

* English sentences are made up of parts. These parts are called 'clauses'.

* Every sentence has a main clause – a part that makes sense on its own (a sentence can have more than one main clause).

* Sub-clauses can then be added to main clauses to make the sentence longer (a sub-clause cannot be a sentence on its own).

* Words like 'and', 'but', 'because', etc., and punctuation (; : () -) link clauses together.

Main Clause: My teacher ate his shoes

Sub-Clause: because he was hungry

1. My teacher ate his shoes (main clause)
2. My teacher ate his shoes because he was hungry
3. Before entering the classroom, my teacher ate his shoes because he was hungry
4. Before entering the classroom, my teacher (who I think is insane) ate his shoes because he was hungry.
5. He had not eaten all day so, before entering the classroom, my teacher (who I think is insane) ate his shoes because he was hungry.
6. He had not eaten all day – his last meal was a salad last night – so, before entering the classroom, my teacher (who I think is insane) ate his shoes because he was hungry.
7. He had not eaten all day – his last meal was a salad last night that he had thought quite disgusting – so, before entering the classroom, my teacher (who I think is insane) ate his shoes because he was hungry.

The rise of the supermarkets has killed many smaller businesses in developed countries because, by buying their produce in bulk, they can offer cheaper products than local merchants. Whilst many people enjoy the romantic idea of the local friendly shop, 'money talks' and more and more people are doing their weekly shop in supermarkets. The days of the local bakery, butcher's shop, greengrocers, and delicatessen may be on the way out, replaced by every city and town having the same big names. Furthermore, out-of-town shopping centres and malls attract people from the city and the countryside. Indeed, such is the lure of the supermarkets that many people have already said 'the death of the high street' is close (or perhaps is already here). 'Save our High Street' campaigns have started to spring up in many places.
